Howard Elias, President and Chief Operating Officer of Global Enterprise Services at EMC Corporation (the "Company"), published a blog post on the Company's employee intranet, of which the following is an excerpt.

Based on some of the very early work by the revenue/market capture team and the GTM work stream, I am even more excited than ever about the growth opportunities we have ahead of us. And this is only considering the existing Dell and EMC customer bases. You may recall that ESG published a brief about Dell-EMC Customer Sentiment Analysis back in November where the majority of Dell and EMC customers said they would spend more money with the new combined Dell/EMC than they do with the separate companies today. On January 28, ESG published a follow-up that looked at the perceptions of non-customers about the combination of Dell and EMC. The results yielded some interesting findings that bode very well for us. More than 50% of these current non-customers expect they will work with Dell-EMC in the future and think the combined Dell-EMC has incremental new value. When asked what factors would prompt these non-customers to move to Dell-EMC from their current IT provider, technology innovation and end- to-end service and support were among the responses most frequently mentioned. Bingo! So there is even more upside with non-customers and underpenetrated accounts and great potential for our sales teams.
